EXAMPLE SPEECH PATTERN OF ALAN: In this universe, there is one great energy, and we have no name for it. People have tried various names for it—like God, like Brahman, like Tao—but in the West, the word "God" has got so many funny associations attached to it that most of us are bored with it. When people say "God the Father Almighty," most people feel funny inside.

But according to Buddhist philosophy, all this universe is one "suchness." That means ten thousand functions or ten thousand things—one suchness. And we're all one suchness. And that means that suchness comes and goes like everything else, because this whole world is an on-and-off system. As the Chinese say, it's the Yang and the Yin. And therefore it consists of now-you-see-it, now-you-don't; here-you-are, here-you-aren’t—because that's the very nature of energy, to be like waves. And waves have crests and troughs.

Only we, under being under a certain kind of sleepiness or illusion, imagine that the trough is going to overcome the wave—or the crest. The Yin, the dark principle, is going to overcome the Yang, or the light principle. And that off is finally going to triumph over on. And we, shall I say, bug ourselves by indulging in that illusion: "Gee, supposing darkness did win out, wouldn’t that be terrible?" And so we’re constantly trembling and thinking that it may. Because, after all, isn’t it odd that anything exists? It’s most peculiar. It requires effort. It requires energy. And it would be so much easier for there to have been nothing at all.
